

NO KIDDING!

HEALTHY GOATS CHANGE LIVES

DAWUNDA'S STORY

Faced with drought, disease and depleting grasslands, many pastoralists in the drylands of Ethiopia and Uganda are struggling to keep their herds alive. For these families whose livelihoods depend on their livestock, poverty and malnutrition are a harsh reality. But thanks to community animal health workers, this reality is changing!

Keeping goats healthy, by supporting local animal health workers, means women like Dawunda can earn an income and lift their families out of poverty, have milk for their children and manure for crops.

I am thankful to Farm Africa for supporting us by making animal health services available in our village. Before, our animals were easily lost to natural disasters and disease outbreaks. Our pastoralist group received ten goats from Farm Africa as well as training in how to care for them. We work with the animal health workers to make sure the goats stay healthy. One of the goats is a buck which we use for crossbreeding. The buck's name is Lempo, meaning big ears! With the female goats, our plan is to multiply them and use them for milk production.
